Smith & Wesson is currently marketing a semi-automatic pistol as a Military and Police (M&P) model, but the name is taken from the double action (DA) revolver that made it famous. Later, the same revolver was assigned the model number "10," when S&W stopped naming their handguns and gave them numbers, instead.

Several versions of M10 were made with longer barrels, including rare "carbine" version with barrel being about 450mm (18") long, and partially enclosed into perforated barrel jacket. The "civilian" clones of Ingram models were made in a great variety of modifications, with minor differences in almost every detail.

The manual of arms for each brand of semi-automatic handgun is somewhat different. One step performed incorrectly or out of sequence can end in disaster. For a revolver, you just open the cylinder, insert the (correct caliber) bullets the only way they will go in (pointy side first) and close the cylinder.
